Adobe Photoshop is also available in an online version, and most offline users consider the desktop version to be lacking in many areas. There are similar online versions available such as the free online version of Photoshop Elements, but they are not as powerful in some areas and are generally good for beginner users. adobe.com/photoshop Adobe Photoshop was first released in the early 1990s and has been in the mainstream of digital imaging since. It has a robust image editing program for manipulating raster images (bitmaps) and for layers and transparency. At least every version since CS2 has come with powerful tools for vector manipulation, including mapping, combining, and converting graphics. The latest versions of the program also allow advanced interactive color adjustments on individual layers. There are over 150 tutorials on the marketplace for Photoshop that range from simple to advanced and illustrate how to use the basic editing functions to make images of a specific style. Some Photoshop learning materials are available online as well as a series of DVD tutorials from the Adobe online help center that cover such topics as creating text and applying filters. Photoshop's multitasking capability is a plus for professional artists and photographers. One can perform many different editing tasks simultaneously. The layers and transparency features in Photoshop work well for some forms of imagery, but beginners would be advised to use the many tutorials in learning how to use these features. While it is not difficult to learn, the more time and effort spent on learning can mean a better overall result for users. Efforts by The Record to file a correction to a guest column last week concerning the challenge of providing affordable housing for thousands of Santa Clara County residents, and to set the record straight on the alleged racial composition of the program, were rejected by the newspaper Monday. Dillon Talbot, reporting for the Record, wrote that the 38-home Habitat for Humanity of Santa Clara County project includes 68 white families. In his column, Talbot further wrote that Habitat's special housing unit was in the Lakeview neighborhood of San Jose, which includes the areas of Northridge, Glenwood, and Silver Creek. His attempt to file a correction to his column, however, was rejected by the paper as being inaccurate. "We have contacted Habitat and it is not true that this housing project is in the Lakeview neighborhood of San Jose," said a statement from Editor David Fong to The Record. He said that the 38 homes were in San Jose's Walnut Creek neighborhood, a neighborhood that is further from the suburban area of Lakeview than the more rural Glenwood and Silver Creek neighborhoods. The record for the most expensive photo of the year goes to a young New York State Police officer out on a license stop in Oswego, N.Y., according to a recent report. The police officer was actually getting a speeding ticket when he decided to get out of his cruiser and take a photo of his ticket, and forgot he was showing it to a cop. It was in fact a picture of his ticket that was published on the Daily Mail's photo blog on March 7. The Daily Mail, in the Daily Mail's defense, wrote that it could not find a photo of the cop's ticket on a larger screen. The scariest and most fascinating paranormal phenomenon of the year has to be the recent spate of unexplained sightings in the Altamont Pass area of California near Yosemite. And the most inexplicable explanation for it so far has to be the suggestion that a gang of aliens are involved. That's the idea behind a new Facebook page set up by a group of Bigfoot enthusiasts, who claim to have been contacted by a group of "aliens" who claim to be in possession of "an earthling" that they want to return. That's the idea behind a new Facebook page set up by a group of Bigfoot enthusiasts, who claim to have been contacted
